the prodigal was alone. But there's always a fatted calf waiting in Washington," he laughed aloud. "Once a soldier, aways a soldier. I suppose I'll be begging the colonel to have a chat with the President. There doesn't seem to be any way of getting out of it. I'll have to don the old togs again. I ought to write a letter to Nancy, but it will be finer to drop in on 'em unexpectedly. Bless her heart! (So say I!) And Jack's, too, and his little wife's! And I haven't written a line in eight weeks. But I'll make it all up in ten minutes. And if I haven't a roof tree, at least I've got the ready cash and can buy one any day." All of which proves that Mr. Robert possessed a buoyant spirit, and refused to be downcast for more than one minute at a time. He threw away his cigar and re-entered the hotel, and threaded his way through the appalling labyrinths of corridors till he that man ever invented!) I might look one quarter as handsome and elegant as Mr. Robert looked, as he came downstairs at 8:10 that night. He wasn't to be blamed if the women glanced in his direction, and then whispered and whispered, and nod-ded and nodded. Ordinarily he would have observed these signs of feminine approval, for there was warm blood in his veins, and it is proverbial that the army man is gallant. But tonight Diana and her white huntresses might have passed him by and not aroused even a flicker of interest or surprise on his face. There was only one pair of eyes, one face, and to see these he would have gladly gone to the ends of the earth, travel-weary though he was.

how I detest all these cars and ships! Will you believe me, I had rather my little chateau, my vineyard, and my wheat fields, than all the orders. . . .Eh, well my country: there must be some magic in that phrase. Of all loves, that of country is the most lasting. Is that Balzac? I do not recall. Only once in a century do we find a man who is willing to betray his country, and even then he may have for his purpose neither hate, revenge, nor love of power." A peculiar gravity sat on his mobile face, caused, perhaps, by some disagreeable inward thought.

"How long shall you be in Washington," asked Warburton.

"Who can say?" The count shrugged. "Who can say?"
"I go to Washington myself within a few asked Warburton.

A Russ understands henor in the rough, but he lacks all those delicate shadings which make the word honor the highest of all words in the vocabularies of the Gaul and Saxon. And while I do not uphold him in what he did, I cannot place much blame at the count's door. Doubtless, in his place, and given his cast of mind, I might have done exactly as he did. Russia never asks how a thing is done, but why it is not done. Ah, these Aspasias, these Circes, these Calypsos, these Cleopatras, with their blue, their gray, their amber eyes! I have my doubts concerning Jonah, but, being a man, I am fully convinced as to the his-tory of Eve. And yet, the woman in this case was absolutely innocent of any gu'ie, unless a pair of eyes as heavenly blue as Pardon me this long parenthesis. By this time, no doubt. Mr. Robert has entered the restaurant. We shall follow him rather than this aimless train of thought.

Mr. Robert's appetite, for a healthy young man was strangely transitive.

young man was strangely incurious. He searched the menu from top to bottom, and then from bottom to top; nothing excited his palate. Whenever persons entered he would glance up eagerly, only to feel his heart sink lower and lower. I don't know how many times he was dis-appointed. The waiter ahemmed politely. Warburton, in order to have an excuse to remain, at length hit upon a partridge and a pint of Chablis.

Nine o'clock. Was it possible that the colonel and his daughter were dining in their rooms? Perish the possibility! And he looked in vain for the count. A quar-ter past 9. Mr. Robert's anxiety was becoming almost unendurable. Nine-thirty, He was about to surrender in despair. His partridge lay smoking on his plate, and he was on the point of demolishing it, when, behold! they came. The colonel entered first, then his daughter, her hand -on-the-arm-of-the-count! War-burton never fully described to me his feelings at that moment; but, knowing him as I do, I can put together a very respectable picture of the chagrin and consternation that sat on his counte-

The three sat down at a table seven times removed from Warburton's. He could see only an adorable profile and the colonel's handsome, but care-worn face. The count sat with his back turned. In that black evening gown she was simply beyond the power of adjectives. What shoulders, what an incomparable throat Mr. Robert's bird grew cold; the bouque from his glass fainted and died away. How her face lighted when she laughed and she laughed frequently! What a de-licious curve ran from her lips to her young bosom! But never once did she look in his direction. Who invented mirrors, the Egyptians? I cannot say. There were mirrors in the room, but Mr. Robert did not realize it. He has since confessed to me that he hadn't the slightest idea how much his bird and bottle cost. Of such is love's young dream! (Do I worry you with all these repetitious details? I am sorry.)

At 10 o'clock Miss Annesley rose, and the count escorted her to the elevator, returning almost immediately. He and the colonel drew their heads together. From time to time the count shrugged or the colonel shook his head. Again and again the Russian dipped the end of his clgar into his coffee cup, which he frequently replenished.
But for Mr. Robert the gold had turned to as light, leaping from one castle in air to another, and still another. Mr. Robert was the architect of some fine ones, I may safely assure you. And he didn't mind in the least that they tumbled down as rapidly as they builded: only, the incentive was gone. What the colonel had to say to the count, or the count to the colonel, was of no interest to him; so he made an orderly re
